VA Questions And Answers

EDITOR'S NOTE: Following are representative questions answered daily by VA counselors. Full information is available at any VA office.

Q - I receive Veterans Administration disability compensation at the 40% rate. I recently married. Can I get any additional money for my wife?

A - Effective October 1, 1978, veterans rated 30% for service-connected causes can receive additional amounts for dependents. Contact your nearest VA regional office.

Q - I want to buy a home that costs $30,000. How much would my monthly payments be?

A - Generally, depending upon the amount of real estate taxes, the monthly payments equal about 1% of the amount financed. If you finance $30,000 your monthly payments should be approximately $300.

Q - My 10 year eligibility period for education assistance will end before I complete my training. Is there any way I can get an extension?

A - Extension can be granted only when a veteran can show that a physical or mental disability, not willfully incurred, prevented starting or completing a training program.

TECH OFFERING SHORT COURSE FOR BEEF CATTLE FEEDERS

BLACKSBURG - Cattle feeders will learn new techniques in feeding, finishing and marketing at Virginia Tech's Beef Cattle Feeder's Short Course Monday, Feb. 26, at the Donaldson Brown Center for Continuing Education and Wednesday, Feb. 28, at the Ramada Inn, I-95 at Washington St. in Petersburg.

The programs in Blacksburg and Petersburg will be similar and producers are invited to attend the conference most convenient for them, Appomattox County Extension agent, James A. Smith, said.

Beginning at 9 a.m., such topics as how frame size and sex affect results, calculating the break-even point in cattle feeding programs, cattle feeding facilities and hedging cattle feeding programs through futures trading will be addressed.

The Blacksburg meeting will include a tour of a local cattle feeding operation. The Petersburg session will feature a panel of cattle feeders consisting of Robert Alpin, Isle of Wight; C. W. "Bud" Engle, Hanover and P. H. Fitzgerald, Nottoway.

Tech Extension specialists and faculty members will join Virginia Cooperative Extension agents in conducting the class. Animal science Extension specialists K. C. Williamson and H. John Gerken Jr. will moderate the sessions.

Workshops Help Injured Return to Work Force

Phoenix, Ariz. —(PWS)— When Fred B. injured his back on the job last year, the disabling effects rippled through all aspects of his life.

Workers' compensation covered his medical bills and provided a portion of his former income but, according to him, "I felt useless."

Fred could not return to his job. He had spent half of his life in an unskilled position in a warehouse and, at age 50, could no longer perform strenuous physical work. With no skills and no high school diploma, his reemployment picture was limited to minimum wage positions, principally part-time.

His family's lifestyle would have to change. He was embarrassed and embittered toward the company in whose service he was injured. The lawyers he consulted could only advise him that the company was not liable for further damages and his union couldn't help. He was inexperienced at searching out and interviewing for new employment and was ready to give up before trying.

Fred's name is fictitious, but his story is true and typical of thousands who became workers' compensation claimants last year. But, there is a happy ending. Fred lives in Phoenix, where a new program of The Travelers Insurance Companies is helping workers' compensation claimants like him return to normal and productive lives.

Problem Solving

At a Jobs Readiness Workshop, Fred participated for one week in sessions in job seeking, personal problem solving and actual interviews with potential employers. He learned from professionals how to return to a former employer by arranging for modifications in working conditions to accommodate a handicap or by accepting a different position. He also was alerted to work which he could perform despite his handicap. From other participants, he gained encouragement and even developed a sense of competitiveness.

Now Fred is easing his way back into the labor force in a part-time position in a company similar to that he left. His self-esteem is restored and he says with assurance, "I'm no longer afraid to look for a full-time job."

According to The Travelers, workshop participants are returning to work more quickly than the average workers' compensation claimant. Pilot workshops were held in the autumn of 1978 in Phoenix and Tucson. After three months, 75 percent of the participants were employed or in company retraining programs and the remainder in various stages of preemployment preparation.

Speedy reentry to the labor force is important. Statistics show that the longer a disabled person is unemployed, the more likely he is to remain permanently out of the work force, out of dejection and frustration. The Travelers plans to open enrollment in the workshops to claimants before they are certified by a physician as able to return to work.

For the employers and insurers, the workshops make good business sense. Quick return to work means less workers' compensation overhead for the former employer, both in actual benefits for the claimant and for administration of the claim by the insurer. In today's inflationary economy, curtailing overhead which contributes to rising prices is especially important.

Because of the early success of the Arizona experience, The Travelers is encouraged to make wider use of workshops. "The workshops are not only a vehicle for efficient, economical service to our insureds, they're an important human service that have made a great difference to the disabled persons they've helped," according to a company spokesperson. YOU

Those of us who take television for granted need to be reminded of how hard and how long men with vision and a firm work ethic labored to give us the technical perfection of the television medium as we know it today.

You have to speak to someone like the still golden-haired and fragile Jessica Dragonette of early radio and early television to realize we have come a long way.

Recently, she held a group of us mesmerized as she told how she had made up David Sarnoff, the former head of RCA, for his first television appearance. We were a bit put off when she mentioned that she had used black lipstick along with the usual rouge—but she colored the story further by saying that later on they advanced to green lipstick. Most amusing of all was her account of how docile and sweet Sarnoff was as he offered himself up to be "painted."

It is hard for us to realize that the pictures and the singing were not simultaneous—that first the picture was shown and then the singing was heard. Also the cameras were stationary—no flexibility—unlike today's television cameras that can follow one into the bath.

One of the most telling things Jessica Dragonette, who, incidentally, still has a voice like a lark, said was that when she did the first commercial television experiment it went only 25 miles to the home of Dr. A. N. Goldsmith, the great television pioneer. The most interesting part of the incident was their conversation afterward when he said: "Some day this will be workable. Even such men of vision and skill can't always know to what heights their brain children will grow. (PWS)
